

I am filing this comment in support of net neutrality and classifying ISPs as Title II entities. Once again, government entities are acquiescing themselves to corporate entities that have never had the interests (best or otherwise) of the public (let alone their own customers) in mind. ISPs and their legal counsel can spin it any way they like, but that doesn't change the fact that ultimately they are looking for ways to charge more money for their services in a manner that essentially boils down to extortion. U.S. history has demonstrated that corporations are constantly on the watch for ways to shimmy and manipulate the system in their favor, especially when it comes to government oversight and regulation. Corporations should not be allowed to so easily alter the nature and the scale of the oversight and regulation they are required by law to submit to. Rescinding net neutrality rules spits in the face of regulation, and since regulation exists to protect the consumer, rescinding net neutrality means ISPs will be able to "spit in their customers' faces" by breaking their trust and charging exorbitant amounts of money for their services. Any and all entities, large or small, should have equal access to the internet and equal access to speeds. If the FCC rescinds these rules and doesn't stand for the interests of the public, they are clearly in the pockets of the ISP corporations and their other entities and therefore are clearly not working on behalf of the population that pays their salary.
